They arrive together—
great shoulders of vapor, long-spined clouds that remember flame.
The sky ripples as if something beneath is stretching,
testing the thin blue skin between worlds.

A giant face leans through—vast, soft-edged, almost too large to name.
Below it, lesser dragons coil from the same breath,
small and bright as ideas breaking free of silence.

The air becomes an instrument:
a low hum where light thickens,
a flicker where dragons are born from the sighs of titans.

Then everything loosens again—
the scales disperse, the gaze withdraws,
and the wind carries the memory of shapes that never fully formed.

Was it cloud? Was it mind?
Only the trees keep the answer,
rooted witnesses to a meeting of sky and fire.
